“Try things out as much as possible early on in your career. Navigate through business lines. I talk to a lot of students coming out of university looking for their first job and they feel they have to make this big, really huge, critical decision, right, in terms of what career path they are going to follow. Look it is important to have direction, but you’re not going to nail your first job right off the bat. Or your first job is not going to be your last job. That is a given, so be willing to expand your knowledge as much as possible, take on different roles. I started off in sales, in hindsight it worked really well because you get to learn about business. You get to learn about products. You get to learn about processes. You get to learn about clients, customers, and how they think. So don’t be shy to dip your feet in the water and get in there, and your career path will follow along the way.”
